Zacharias Kunuk's latest doc takes home festival prize

Inuit Cree Reconciliation wins Best Short Documentary

NUNATSIAQ NEWS

A new documentary film detailing an 18th century "war" between Inuit and Cree in what is now Quebec took the Best Short Documentary award at this year's imagine-NATIVE Film and Media Arts Festival.

The world première of Inuit Cree Reconciliation took place Oct. 17 at the international festival, which showcases indigenous artists from Canada and abroad.

The imagineNATIVE site described the film this way: "Coupled with incredible footage and a fantastic soundtrack, the film depicts the modern complexities of two communities living together in Canada's Far North and an age-old conflict between the Cree and Inuit that lasted more than a century."

The award comes with a $1,000 prize.

Inuit Cree Reconciliation is the product of Igloolik's Zacharias Kunuk, who teamed up with Cree filmmaker Neil Diamond in 2010 to research the events and historical impacts of a 1770s conflict between Inuit and Cree in northern Quebec.

In the film, Kunuk and Diamond follow both groups to a remote site along the Nastapoka River where their ancestors once clashed, to film a celebration held there to mark 200 years of peace.

After that historic peace celebration in 2011, Kunuk and Diamond interviewed Inuit and Cree elders in the twin communities of Kuujjuaraapik and Whapmagoostui to illustrate the modern complexities of two peoples living side by side.

The 44-minute long documentary is in both Cree and Inuktitut, with English subtitles.
